Three people have been killed and 13 others injured in a shooting in Jerusalem. Israeli emergency services report that two men opened fire this morning from a car that was next to a bus stop. Police there have stated in a press release that two suspects have been neutralised.

The shooting comes shortly after the truce between Hamas and Israel was extended. The Israeli army made the announcement on social networks just moments before the truce was due to end. More hostages are due to be released on Thursday. The French-Israeli hostage Mia Schem could be among those released by Hamas this evening.

Cop 28, the major climate conference, gets underway today in Dubai. The objective is to curtail climate change and rising temperatures. A major issue up for debate is how can we reduce our reliance on fossil fuels.

Inflation is slowing down in France. According to figures published by INSEE, the national statistics institute in November, prices increased by 3.4% over the course of a year compared to just over 4% in October. The decline may be due to the slowdown in the prices of services and energy over the course of a year.

Eric Dupont Moretti was acquitted by the Court of Justice of the Republic yesterday, stating that he never had the intention of taking revenge. The Keeper of the Seals had been suspected of using his position to settle scores with magistrates.

And finally, France could be looking at a second dose of Olympic Games in the next few years, as so far France is the only country to have its application to host the 2030 Olympic Winter Games accepted by the IOC. The final decision will be made in July. As for the summer games which are just over 8 months away, the IOC is putting the final batch of tickets up for sale today.
